SEATTLE, FRIDAY, JUNE 7, 1889.

THE FIRE.

The story which is told this morning needs no elaboration. Our whole business and commercial district, the very heart and center of the city, up north of a few minutes were blacked with fire. The Denney block, is left standing. Every bank, every wholesale house, every hotel, every newspaper office and nearly every store has been consumed. The property which yesterday morning represented upwards of ten millions of dollars has been utterly destroyed. The facts speak for themselves. In the presence of such calamity it is impossible to multiply phrases. No other American city ever suffered a loss proportionately great.

But great as is this calamity there is good fortune in it. The destruction is attended with comparatively little personal distress. The residence districts remain practically untouched, and even those whose money losses are terrible are comfortably housed in their accustomed homes. It is not a disaster that will cause any losses will fall upon those best able to support them and to replace the property which has been destroyed. On the part of those who might be expected to feel there is no reason for regret, loss, and the indirect losses will not seriously affect them.

While Seattle has received a terrible blow, there is not the slightest danger that it will be a fatal one. Obstacles as is well known, have heretofore served only to stimulate our people to new and greater efforts, and the spirit which has heretofore sustained the city has sustained her in this hour of calamity. Not one of the business establishments which is homeless this morning will be more than temporarily embarrassed by the misfortune that has fallen upon us. While the flames are yet active, and while the embers are still glowing, preparations are making for reestablishing every line and department of our business. It will be rebuilt, and the confidence we have assurance from many sources upon a plan much more liberal and extensive than formerly. The relationship of trade and commerce between Seattle and the coast is so large will not be broken, nor even seriously disturbed.

We believe that it will be comparatively but a short time until the immediate loss which has fallen on us will prove to be indirectly a great and permanent blessing. From the ruins of Seattle there will spring a new Seattle, just as from the ruins of Chicago a new Chicago has sprung a new and mightier Chicago.

We will not at this time undertake to point out the lessons of this disaster. They are obvious. The city has been so safe for protection against inevitable dangers that it has incurred the penalties of indifference and neglect of important public demands. Of these demands in their relationship to our future affairs the Post-Intelligencer has been clearly fully aware, and we trust that in the light of yesterday's disaster will get a more attentive hearing from the public.

The Post-Intelligencer was among the heavy losses by yesterday's fire. The offices, the editorial department, its full equipment of heavy machinery have been destroyed. But we have no thought of more than a temporary embarrassment which we feel assured the public will cheerfully overlook. The paper is temporarily housed in a dwelling at the northwest corner of Fourth and Columbia streets and will be issued every day, for the present, in somewhat diminished form. New machinery has already been ordered by telegraph and we hope to be able within a very short time to present to the public the Post-Intelligencer in its usual form.

The Business Part of Seattle in Ruins.

Thirty-Two Blocks of Smoking Debris.

The Loss Will Exceed Ten Millions.

A Little Blaze at Madison Street Becomes a Giant of Destruction Ravaging All the Lowlands to the South-Fire-Proof Brick and Frail Wood Alone Food for the Forked Tongues—The Phoenix.

The business part of Seattle is in ruins. Between the hours of 2 and 3 o'clock yesterday a wall of fire sprang up at Madison street, and in a few minutes it was a fact. men to stand in front of the wall of fire to work on the opera house. The whole block of opera house buildings were in operation, but by this time shared the general fate of the city. The opera house and the building occupied by the Commercial Union were the last to be destroyed. Men tried to brave the intense heat by the burning of the opera house. The opera house was driven back with scorching fumes and the opera house was driven back with scorching fumes and the opera house was driven back with scorching fumes.

Up to this time Marshall Murphy had been the only head of the fire department; but Marshall Moran and John McLean were now appeared on the scene and attempted to bring order out of confusion. Parties were organized to carry goods out of the buildings in the path of the flames and the side streets in a few minutes were blocked with merchandise. Chief Butterfield took to street every man found standing and in a few minutes the reliable had become a working crowd, led by intelligent men.
